

BELLONS FALLS, JAN. 10, 1862.

The Vermont Soldiers.

"You Can't Always Tell."

The last advices from Europe represented a reaction as in progress. The provincial papers, particularly, were down upon the war fever, and went in for negotiation.

"We will agitate, agitate, agitate this question, until we shall finally dissolve all political connection with the North, and establish a government at the South with new guards for our future security." The alleged cause of dissatisfaction was the compromise measures of 1850, which did not yield enough of northern rights to satisfy the southern oligarchy; but there is not a shadow of doubt that the vipers of Secession have been warmed and nursed into active and terrible life from eggs laid by the nullifiers of 1821, several years before the anti-slavery agitation aroused free states to the nature of their foe. The prediction of that clear-headed patriot, Andrew Jackson, that the "slavery or negro question" would be seized as the next pretext for disunion, is verified by written proof from
